PRESS REPRESENTATION.

ARIOUS facts have recently occurred which illustrate, in a very marked manner, the advantage derived by any body of workers from the possession of a distinct representative organ in the Press. This is a fact indeed which is widely recognised, and the importance of which can hardly be exaggerated.

In the medical profession, for example, the success and growth of the British Medical Association is bound up with, and is largely dependent upon, the success and growth of its organ, the British Medical Journal. As that organ has increased in size, in usefulness, and in power, the Association to which it belongs has increased in numbers and influence.

It is not indeed too much to say that no professional body can achieve any results of importance unless it has, behind it, a Journal which will diffuse its views far and wide, and circulate throughout the world its intentions and its proceedings. We are therefore pleased to learn from influential correspondents, in every part of the world, that the NURSING RECORD is now generally recognised as the exponent of the views and the aspirations of Trained Nurses, and of the work which they accomplish; and, furthermore, that the reforms which we have advocated in these columns have received the considerate attention of many Hospital Managers.

Beyond all this, however, it affords us unfeigned gratification to learn that the NURSING RECORD is acting as an educational medium, by bringing before its readers, in far distant lands, various schemes of improvement in Nursing in the old country, of which, without this medium, workers in
