

The National Greek Ambulance Fund.

MANY of our readers who have taken such a deep interest in the work in Greece, in connection with the above Fund, will, we feel sure, be much interested in the sketches of the two hospitals here produced, for which we are indebted to the courtesy of the Editor

Chalcis 100 beds were full, and at the Vigon Hospital at the Piræus there was accommodation for twenty-six patients, to say nothing of the self-sacrificing work of those nurses who worked in the Red Cross Hospitals—at Arta, Karavassara, and latterly at Patras.

To the courage and devotion of the English doctor and nurses, and the first-class quality of their work, there has been but one opinion expressed—upon the part of the Royal Family of Greece, the Government officials, the patients, and the Athenian press—so that any malicious depreciation of the great international of the Daily Chronicle. It will be remembered that 27 Sisters were altogether equipped and sent out to Greece to help to nurse the wounded by the National Fund, and it may not be known that at one time, after the disastrous battles of Gribovo and Domoko, the Sisters were in charge of the nursing of upwards of 600 patients. At the beautiful Ecole Militaire, in Athens, the wards contained upwards of 450 wounded men; in the Military Hospital the Sisters superintended the nursing of 50 of the worst cases; at work, which has been accomplished by the Daily Chronicle National Fund, which has emanated from one source only, must be taken for what it is worth. Now that the good work is practically at an end and the majority of the working staff have returned home, we heartily thank the Editor of the Daily Chronicle and the generous readers of his valuable paper for providing the means whereby English nurses were enabled to show their sympathy with suffering, and take so prominent a part in "Nursing the Wounded."
