Two nurses were in attendance at the Mansion House last week, when Miss Glover, "the lost old lady," who was found wandering about the city with eight thousand pounds worth of property upon her, came before the Lord Mayor. Miss Glover, who was taken by the police to the Bow Infirmary, was seen by the Lord Mayor in his parlour, not in the Justice Room, and what evidence there was was taken there. His lordship made an order for Miss Glover to be taken to the City of London Lunatic Asylum at Stone, and told her, in reply to her complaints of people following her about, that he would send her where they could not follow her, and where she would have a peaceable time. He shook hands with her, and asked her to go with the nurses, who, he said, would take great care of her. After some persuasion, Miss Glover left the room with the nurses.

Speaking at Dingwall recently, Major W. C. Ross, C.B., Durham Light Infantry, who had his jaw shot away in South Africa, paid high tribute to the value of good medical and nursing care. He referred to nursing in India before the days of Lady Roberts's nurses. Then, he said, they were left in the hands of good old Thomas Atkins, who was no doubt a very devoted and very often an excellent nurse, although somewhat rough in his methods. The difference now as compared with the old days was extraordinary. Hundreds upon hundreds of valuable lives and of valuable limbs had been saved through good nursing in the South African campaign. He doubted whether there was any person there who at any time had more personal experiences of nurses than he had had. He had lately been through a six months' course. He owed much to good surgery. Possibly the fact that he was able to speak that day was due to able surgery; but that he was able to be there at all, he considered, was due to good nursing.
