

turn covered by a large piece of rubber tissue, oiled silk, or other impervious material. A thick layer of non-absorbent cotton and a bandage will, by its elasticity, hold the dressing securely and comfortably in place.

The patient experiences a sense of local warmth and comfort soon after the application of this dressing, and in a few hours the glycerine will have absorbed so much water from the tissues that it becomes liquid instead of syrupy. The bed and the patient's clothing should be properly protected to prevent soiling by this liquefied glycerine.
