THE LONDON HOSPITAL—I.

WE recur, once more, and, so far as we are concerned, for the last time in these pages, to the subject of the London Hospital. But we hope that the demand for reforms at that great Institution, which we have so consistently advocated, will not cease until those improvements, which are so urgently necessary, have been obtained and brought into effect. We can, personally, retire from our position of public criticism, feeling that we have been more than justified in everything we have said upon this subject, that our remonstrances have had some effect, and that time will prove that we have been more truly friendly to the London Hospital than its authorities have been.

For many reasons, the latest charges against this Institution, and the manner in which they have been made and met, are most instructive and significant. It will be remembered that, in July, 1890, various ladies, who had been formerly Nurses at the Hospital, made certain charges against the management of its Nursing Department. For years previously, there had been many stories told to its disparagement, and these seemed to culminate in the inquiry
