We beg to acknowledge with gratitude a donation of £5 from Mr. Charles Harrison, for Sir Julian Goldsmid's Home of Rest for Nurses, at Brighton. These gifts are most welcome, as what with increased taxation and the price of all things, the bank balance is very low.

At that delightful function, the monthly luncheon of the Society of American Women in London, held at "Prince's" on Monday, the members had quite a "field day," when Mrs. Henry Fawcett and Mrs. Bedford Fenwick were the guests and speakers. Mrs. Hugh Reid Griffin presided, with her usual charm and grace.

Mrs. Fawcett spoke eloquently, not, as she explained, on her special subject, the enfranchisement of women, but on the topic of the hour, "What women can do to help in time of war," and she referred in patriotic terms to the generous wave of emotion which animates men and women alike, in their desire to help the sick and wounded when a nation is at war. She also spoke with warm indignation of the unjust and false reports of our brave troops on active service, and refuted all imputations of cruelty, and lack of courtesy to women, on their part.

Mrs. Fenwick took up two important points, the progress of professional nursing in England and the United States, and Army Nursing Reform, and proved how wonderfully self government under the Stars and Stripes had advanced the organisation of trained nurses, so that where—ten years ago—no basis of combination existed, to-day the nurses had cast a net of professional fellowship over every State in the Union; by the formation of societies of graduates, affiliated to a national society of nurses, they were also, with the Superintendents, prepared to enter the International Council of Nurses. Thus American Nurses were professionally enfranchised, and had, by delegation, a voice in the government of their own profession. Mrs. Fenwick contrasted this splendid
