

solution of 2 per cent. argyrol or cyllin half a drachm to the pint. This is accomplished by means of a small male catheter, which is passed well up into the metal tube. It is essential that a free return of fluid should be ensured, and that a fall of not greater than half a foot or so be employed, otherwise a distinct risk of peritoneal infection is incurred. The tube is removed at the end of one week. This method of treatment gives highly satisfactory results in cases that otherwise have proved to be exceedingly chronic and troublesome.

A New Feeder.

The new china feeder designed by Dr. Shufflebotham, of Newcastle-under-Lyme, and described by him in the Lancet, is said to possess the following advantages over the glass feeder:—1. It presents a superior appearance. 2. It is more easily cleaned and looks cleaner when it is washed. This is all the more apparent after the use of some such liquid as milk. 3. Its surface is nicer to the touch and it is not scratched like the surface of a glass feeder which has been in use for a few weeks. 4. It will stand high temperatures better than a glass feeder. It is believed to be cheaper than the glass feeder. The shape of this feeder enables it to be more easily washed and kept clean than the old-fashioned china feeder with a spout. Its use is, moreover, free from the great difficulty which some persons have in drinking out of a spout. By the kind permission of Dr. Shufflebotham we are able to publish the accompanying illustration.
