

medical school exclusively for India's women, so that it has strong claims on the support it receives in England, the United States, and Australia. The Women's Medical College of Pennsylvania support a bed, and the nurses of the Clifton Springs Sanatorium, U.S.A., also hope to maintain one permanently. Our second illustration represents the convalescents enjoying sun baths in the courtyard of the hospital. To a European, this basking in the vertical rays of the tropical sun would mean not only sun fever but probably death, but natives of the country not only enjoy but

In writing of the Memorial Hospital, Ludhiana, we do not forget the splendid work done by the Dufferin Hospitals, work initiated by the noble-hearted wife of one of India's greatest Viceroys, but the officers working under the the Dufferin Fund are pledged not to proselytise, while a primary object of the constitution of the North India School of Medicine is to fit those who are trained there to act as medical missionaries, to carry to their patients side by side with the healing of the body the news of the healing for the soul to the very existence of which be it remembered, is benefit by its warmth. An all beneficent nature has provided them with a pigmented skin and a thick cranium which afford a protection from its injurious effects, and Dr. Condict attributes Dr. Brown's unparalleled success in the matter of rapid recoveries after major surgery at least in part to the wise use of these sun baths which, at the proper juncture, she is sure to give.

In this court, where the patients lead as much as possible their natural lives, everything is as strictly purdah as in the wards, although it is open to the health-giving sunshine, denied, in the case of women, by the followers of Mahommed.

No mention of the Memorial Hospital, Ludhiana, would be complete without reference to the training school for nurses connected with it, which, under the able superintendence of Miss J. Winifred Thorpe, a member of the Matrons' Council of Great Britain and Ireland, is doing such excellent work. The Committee stated in its annual report how much it appreciates the efforts of Sister Winifred (Miss Thorpe) to raise the standard of the Nurses' Training School, and trusts that the next few
