To pay even a brief visit to the Queen's Hospital is to understand something of the immense boon it must be to a neighbourhood teeming with children, living in closely crowded houses; and to see the alert, busy, and evidently competent nursing staff is to realise that it is serving a most useful function as a training school for nurses of sick children. On both these counts, though removed from close contact with the wealthy classes, it merits their generous support.

The following is the Foreword of the President :—“ I would have all nurses set a very high standard before themselves. All who put on a nurse's uniform should realize that thenceforth they must not fail to walk worthy of the vocation whereto they are called, and should earnestly resolve never to rest satisfied with attaining anything short of the highest efficiency, and the most completely conscientious devotion to duty.”

ALBULACTIN.

Many patriotic midwives and nurses who have found Albulactin an invaluable stand-by in the care of bottle fed babies, and who have been unable to use it recently because it was a German product, will be rejoiced to know that it is again.

A NEW LEAGUE JOURNAL.

We heartily congratulate the Leeds Township Infirmary Nurses' League, of which Miss F. Parker Spann, the Matron of the Township Infirmary, Leeds, is President, on the issue of its first Journal, which is edited by Dr. Faith, A.M.O. It opens with a Foreword by Dr. Allan, Patron, and as a book lover we highly commend the excellent paper and general make up of the magazine. We hope to find space to do justice to "L. T. I." next week, and meanwhile quote the last words of the Editor, "It is our ambition that this Journal should be written and run by nurses for nurses." We applaud the sentiment.

available, as the Sanatogen Company, which supplies Albulactin, is now entirely British, having been purchased by a British Company, of which Lady Mackworth, the daughter of Lord Rhondda, is Chairman.

The special value of Albulactin consists in the fact that it consists of pure milk albumin, that vital constituent of mother's milk which renders it nourishing and digestible to babies, and which is very abundant in human milk, and very scarce in all others. Many doctors prefer diluted cow's milk to any other diet for bottle fed babies, but such milk is very deficient in milk albumin, which is so important to the well being of the infant. The addition of Albulactin will remedy this deficiency. It is sold by all chemists from 1s. 3d. a bottle, or liberal samples can be obtained on application to the British Purchasers of the Sanatogen Co., 12, Chenies Street, London, W.C.
