THE GREAT VICTORY.

March 13th will not easily be effaced from the minds and hearts of the great audience in the Queen's Hall, assembled to commemorate with thankfulness the great victory of the coming of the Suffrage to the women of Great Britain. The meeting was organised by, and under the auspices of, the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, among which were the Church League for Women's Suffrage and the Women's Freedom League. The meeting began and ended with exquisite music provided by the London Symphony Orchestra and Choir, assisted by members of the Bach Choir. The conductor was no less a person than Sir Hubert Parry. Under such inspiring auspices the speakers could scarcely fail to take the high tone they did. Mrs. Henry Fawcett, LL.D., in presiding, reminded the audience, with pardonable pride, of the fifty years of strenuous work for the common cause with which she had continuously identified herself. There was no necessity to look back to the struggles and difficulties of the past; the victory had been won and the future was full of promise. With the privilege and the freedom, came, however, great responsibility. The speaker said in effect, We are debtors to the community, how are we going to discharge that debt?

Great applause greeted Lord Lytton as he rose to echo Mrs. Fawcett's words, to which he added many generous words of his own and his whole-hearted congratulations to the women on their victory. They have had no truer friend.

Not less acceptable to the great audience was the speech of Mr. Henderson, which was marked by fervour and earnestness. He warned the women against being content with a partial victory. He claimed for them the right of full citizenship on equal terms with men. Special applause greeted his remark that there must no longer be a dual standard of morality as between men and women.

Miss Maude Royden enthused the audience with her usual inspiring speech, following up and supporting Mr. Henderson on the morality side.

B. K.

New Brunswick is to give votes to women. This will make Quebec and Prince Edward Island the only provinces in Canada where women are not enfranchised.

For the second year in succession the Lords passed on Tuesday a Bill qualifying women as solicitors.

In the Commons last year the Government could not give time to the Bill.

It is to be hoped time will be given this year, instead of further waste in personal wrangles.

Miss Katharine T. Wallas was elected on Tuesday as the first woman deputy-chairman of the London County Council.
