CARE OF THE WOUNDED.

The American Red Cross has given £250,000 to the British Red Cross "to alleviate as far as possible the suffering caused by the great battle."

It has also recognised the good work of the Scottish Women's Hospitals by making them a gift of £20,000. The gift is made at the instance of Miss Kathleen Burke.

The Sale of artistic treasures, now an annual event, conducted by Messrs. Christie for the Red Cross and Order of St. John, will begin on Monday next, the catalogue is now being sold at 2s. 6d., and the articles will be on view in King Street, W., on April 4th, when 2s. 6d. will be charged, and free of charge on the mornings of April 5th and 6th. This year's sale will be specially strong in antique silver—which now brings such immense prices under the hammer—and in drawings, prints and manuscripts. We hope the bidding will constitute a record.

The Ministry of National Service has issued an appeal to members of the medical profession to come forward and offer voluntary service to cope with the large number of casualties at the Front. Most generous of "professionals" we have no doubt the medical profession will respond to the appeal; but when we realise the first-rate part-time services offered to our sick and wounded, which up to now have been ignored or refused by the War Office, it is little wonder the need is acute. Because a medical man is sixty, that does not constitute him incapable of doing first-rate work, and War Office red tape, devoid of discrimination has lost most valuable aid for the Army ever since the beginning of the war. Let us hope some common sense will now prevail.

The world's greatest battle, now being waged in France, has taken terrible toll of life. We know little of our own heart-rending losses; but the slaughter of Germans has been colossal. So apprehensive are the Prussian War Lords of the consequences of the reckless offensive that wherever possible the long convoys of wounded have been posted to hospitals in Belgium in
