

intellectual gain to its readers. The familiar conversational style adds greatly to its charm, and one can quite easily forget that one is studying until one receives the pleasant shock of increased understanding and knowledge of Medicine and Medical Nursing.

Nurses who are studying for their Final State Examination will naturally want their own copy for—in addition to its other merits—it provides excellent bedside reading. We wish the book all the success which it most certainly merits."

Parkinson's Disease.*

By Walter Buchler.

An instructive little manual on how to be happy, co-operative, and even prosperous, in spite of having Parkinson's Disease. The book was obviously intended for fellow-sufferers, but because of its originality of subject, and the light and courageous style of its presentation, it should appeal to all classes of readers. We certainly wish it all the success it deserves.

Clinical Instruction.*

By Amy Frances Brown, R.N., B.Ed., M.S. in N.

This manual contains rather complicated methods of teaching Nurses in American Schools of Nursing. It is based upon psychological studies of learning, and is rather involved and difficult to digest. Methods of discovering the learning capacities of the students have been evolved, and detailed advice on teaching given to clinical instructors, Head Nurses and Supervisors. It is open to doubt whether the book would be so useful to teachers in this country, as in the United States of America, where the status and immediate education of the Student Nurses differs so vastly from ours.

There is no doubting the intellectual attainments of the very learned author, and the yeoman's work put into the book to bring it to such a peak of detailed and intricate perfection. We in England have not yet evolved such specialised methods of teaching our Nurses—possibly because we cannot afford to be so leisurely and penetrating; and also because, as I mentioned before, our Nursing Students are differently equipped from those presenting themselves to the American Schools of Nursing. We wish Miss Brown all success—for her efforts merit acknowledgement and congratulations.
